The injury from the workplace and making claims for the injury is usually physically and emotionally hard. This is because the hurt person should also peruse an injury claim while also suffering from the injury.

Under the workers insurance system, staff are given guaranteed compensation for accepted claims in exchange for giving up their right to file a suit against work-related injuries. The employer finances the program through premiums. This is of benefit to the employer, who receives protection from lawsuits under this system of collective liability. Injured workers and their families receive just compensation, while costs are spread among employers.

However, personnel can sue employers in certain circumstances. Personnel could sue employers in trades that are exempt from the workers insurance system. Workers may take legal action against fellow staff if they were "outside the course of their employment" when the injury took place. An employee may be entitled to benefits under the insurance plan with respect to an injury or disease, and may also be entitled to file a suit against an individual in respect of the injury; for instance, an individual driving in the course of their employment can file a suit against the driver of the vehicle that injured them.
